"The Voice of a Siren"

Review By: Mr. Sexy

The process of putting out an online magazine bi-monthly can be a very daunting task. It requires organization, planning in advance. I try to line up the artists I wish to review a few issues ahead, normally coinciding with a release date or some other relevant point on the calendar. For sanity's sake I try to keep to this regime, but there are points when you must yield to your muse and change the rules. That is exactly where I found myself one Friday night, when the voice of a siren seemed to draw me through the fog of my daily pressures and beckon me to the shore of the stage to hear her song.

That sirens name was Adrienne. A singer/songwriter formally based in L.A. and currently hailing from Atlanta, I was lucky enough to have stumbled across one of her tour dates as she promotes her latest album, "Sweet Mistake" (released on the WRC/RYSKO record label). She is a pleasure to watch live, dynamic and vibrant she keeps the audience in her trance with her engaging stories and off the cuff sense of humor. She is comfortable in her skin and this in turn leaves the rest of us at ease and relaxed, willing to trust her to take us on her ride.

Her music is immediately addicting, well crafted lyrics interwoven with catchy and beautiful melodies. Her words are personal and raw, an edge of truth allowing us an unapologetic glimpse into her world. The quality of her voice is superb, crystal clear tones and well controlled lilt keep you hanging onto her every note.

There is no doubt in this reviewer's mind that Adrienne is a force to watch. She has found her own voice in the oft cookie cutter world of the recording industry. It is just as fulfilling to sit at home and listen to her CD's as it is to sit in that intimate coffee shop and get to interact with her live on stage. If you can catch a show when she is near you let me suggest you try, for I have a feeling that someday soon it will become more difficult to get a seat that close to her again.
